14:27

Hi, thanks for trying LuminaEye for the past few days. Could you briefly tell me how your overall experience has been?

Overall, I think it is helpful. The voice guidance makes me feel more confident when walking, especially in familiar areas.

What part of the glasses did you find most useful?

The most useful part is that it reminds me about obstacles and directions. For example, when there is something in front of me, the warning helps me slow down or change direction.

Did you notice any problems after using it for a longer time?

Yes, after wearing it for a while, I can feel the weight more clearly. It is fine for short walks, but after longer use, it becomes a bit uncomfortable around the nose and temples.

Did the weight affect how you used the glasses?

A little. When I walk normally, it is acceptable. But when I need to turn my head often to check the surroundings, the glasses feel less stable.

How about the voice guidance? Was it clear during daily use?

Most of the time it was clear. But in noisy places, such as near traffic or busy streets, I sometimes needed the volume to be louder.

Did the glasses always recognise objects correctly?

Not always. Sometimes it gives a useful warning, but the object name is not correct. I think it is more important to tell me where the obstacle is and whether it blocks my path.

Did this affect your trust in the product?

Yes, a little. If it only gets the object name wrong, I can still use the warning. But if it misses an obstacle completely, that makes me less confident.

Would you continue using LuminaEye if these issues were improved?

Yes, I would. I think the idea is useful, especially for outdoor walking. If the glasses become lighter, the alerts are more accurate, and the volume adjusts automatically, I would feel more comfortable using them regularly.

Thank you. Is there anything else you would like to add?

I think the product has potential, but it should focus on safety first. Clear warnings about direction, distance, and obstacles are more important than giving too many details.